Lion's Treasure: Hidden Dragon 3 Free Awards for Veni Vidi Vici Sunday night is like a black velvet dip, eyes go a little bit blind, and horizons soften to that glowing substance of red, unutterable colors. I'm starting to feel too hot, walking around in the sun is a painful experience for me, and I go back to that shady side of the courtyard. There is hardly any wind, and the vast, free expanse of dust remains unmoved; I feel as if I were cooling my heels at the station. But the courtyard has got a peculiar, comfortable air; somebody is sitting at the other end of the bench, looking at me. A familiar feeling of anxiety stirs within me; I know that person, yet I don't know him at all, and I would be quite glad if he would not turn away to give me the right moment to leave. The person whose observation I feel is, I fancy, a painter, who has fallen from his easel, and who now lies in the shade. And in fact there are two, and one of them is lying on his back, with eyes that look most sorrowful and seem to be looking at the distant blue expanse. Yes, he is young and unhappy. Perhaps because of his easel he is hot and tired, and he has become a brooding figure. Who cares for me? I won't stop on my way back to the ticket-house, I won't even take the trouble to see if my example is needed there; perhaps the young man will hear me, and will turn his head. At once I'm running, full speed, I see his face. My heart beats wildly; I know at last. "He is alive, he is alive," I say to myself. I'm going to get the ticket-house noiselessly. I breathe more and more quickly; I can hardly believe that I can draw breath at all. When I'm opening the door, he will get up and look at me! But he doesn't get up; with a movement as swift as lightning he springs to his feet, to the left, to the right. I see him, and I see that he is running farther and farther away. "He doesn't see me, he doesn't see me!" I cry aloud with the joy of vengeance. I'm going f988f36e3a
